Introduction

In recent decades, superhero comics have become an important part of American pop culture genre, working primarily to punish bad and promote good narrative mode with vibrant characters. As a result of two extremely representative superhero universes: the Marvel world and the DC universe, with the advancement of the media industries, superheroes are no longer limited to comic books; film companies will bring them to the screen. In these two-superhero series of film and television shows, the Marvel Universe and the DC Universe present many unique characteristics.

This presentation will compare the film and television productions, as well as the superhero characters, from the two worlds in order to determine which reality is more popular and which superheroes are the most powerful.

Conclusion

- Marvel focus on group portrait while DC like to build personal stories.
 - Marvel has more international audiences and receives higher ratings from both professional and public audiences.
 - Superhero movie box office is greatly influenced by length and popularity of the movie.
 - Character designs for MARVEL and DC are similar.
 - Evil characters are generally more powerful to reveal the theme that “good triumphs evil not because of strength but a good heart”.
